

Q.2 Parents and teachers make many rules for children to encourage good behavior and protect them from danger. However, children would benefit from fewer rules and greater freedom.

To what extent do you agree or disagree?

It is the duty of the parents and the teachers to nurture the children and protect them from all harm. In trying to do so they impose many restrictions on the children which hinders their personality growth. Rules should be as required as giving liberty promotes creativity. In my opinion, though rules are important to live in a social society, it should be to a minimum.

The personality of a person is the reflection of their childhood experiences. Many believe that parents and teachers should impose strict rules on children which will help them to live a disciplined life in the future. In addition, it would give them a sense of responsibility on how to act in public. However, restricting the children all the time may make them rebellious and they would do the opposite of what was told them to do.

On the other hand, psychologists believe that the children who had less restriction growing up tended to be more creative and had a more spirited personality. They are even more vocal in their opinion and not afraid to speak their mind. Greater freedom fosters creativity and potential hidden talent and develops their decision making skills. Additionally, it would enhance their confidence level too. There are examples of many famous artists like Ranveer Singh who have shared their story where their parent's support and freedom had encouraged them to make their own mark in their life.

In conclusion, there should be rules imposed by parents and teachers on children but only to guide them to walk the right path and not to impose rules that would obstruct their personality development.
